The Supreme Court put the defense of another guilty sexual assault defendant on hold in the first term session, setting a crucial federal appeals court battle to resume in Philadelphia. The high court's order is another twist for Marcelo Ballesteros Jr., 42, facing trial in a second criminal case even as his attorneys race to file new arguments questioning his aggravated rape conviction in the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals. The National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers maintains it is a common practice for a high court order to be passed down from one case to the next. But Ballesteros' appeal did not take up the full sequence of the cases the Philadelphia-based appeals court is reviewing. The order will come before the federal appeals court by the end of the month. "We have no idea what the Supreme Court did," said the trial lawyer who represented the young man in his first federal court assault case. "My cell phone lit up." Both trials lasted less than a week with the men's attorneys labeling the proceedings a "kangaroo court" to intimidate their clients. One of the two defendants, Romario Colon, 45, was acquitted, and another, Emanuel Cadena-Fuentes, 32, was found guilty of federal charges in the March trial. Ballesteros' defense team did not press their client's case. Ballesteros' attorneys said in a motion that they have been preparing to file arguments by June. The defense team also requested that U.S. Supreme Court to delay consideration of Ballesteros' case.

The Philadelphia District Attorney's Office and prosecutors who handled the case declined comment. Ballesteros, who is currently serving out the longest federal sentence ever imposed in the state, was convicted of sexually assaulting another young man. A third victim testified against him in the case. The defendant is in a Pennsylvania prison in response to a state conviction in 2002 for child prostitution, court documents show. Ballesteros was a high school basketball player when he was convicted and imprisoned for the sexual assault in 1990. When he was released, he was about 17 years old

In a broadcast or cable network it is possible to deliver a content item to many devices using a broadcast feed. However, this method is essentially a "one-to-many" approach, in the sense that there is no way to send the content item to a single device. Content delivered to "one-to-one 3e33713323
